

It's noticeable in the many collections for Serax that Marie Michielssen likes to take the ideas in her head and turn them into objects that she shapes by hand. Her Earth pots, vases and bowls made of the forgotten material, paper mâché, which she has revived, are a worldwide success. Following this range, she ventured into similar shapes, but this time executed in ceramics. Like with paper mâché, Marie likes to experiment with the material and literally hold it in her hand. The result is a harmonious yet playful range of vases/pots based on three different models in different sizes. You can "mix and match" them to your heart's content. Executed in off-white stoneware, matte on the outside, and glazed on the inside, these Molly vases and pots make a graphic eye-catcher for every interior. And for those who can't choose between the various shapes, there is the mini-Molly set of 6 vases in white stoneware. Always decorative, with or without flowers.

MARIE MICHIELSSEN

Marie Michielssen has been designing for Serax since 25 years. Over the years, she has evolved with the company that initially supplied decorative pots and vases to florists and garden centers. She came across Serax when she was looking for a wholesaler that could distribute her flower pot collection. Trained as a graphic designer, she became self-employed in 1995. A friend gave her the idea to paint the typical terracotta pots which you used to see a lot in greenhouses. She drove past horticultural companies to buy, paint and patina those old flower pots, which became an instant success. The whole production and sales process becoming too big for Marie's small company, she presented the collection to Serax. And she stayed on as the company's resident designer.
